

Complexity in the Public Sector: Understanding it

Workshop Overview

How can we develop practical ways of working that harness the collective energy, intelligence and creativity across the public sector and beyond? This workshop will explore how public sector participants can approach complexity skilfully in their day-to-day to work.

The new government has set and adopted five missions. This re-imagining of government presents both an unprecedented opportunity and a significant shift in culture and ways of working and organising for the public sector.

This half-day workshop will explore how participants can approach complexity skilfully in their day-day work. There will be a focus on the mindset and presence underpinning the use of insights and tools. The style will be highly interactive and experiential to support participants to make sense of their unique contexts together and give them an insight into their own practice and learning 'edge'.

We bring to bear Mayvin's expertise and experience: from building communities of practice in organisational change across the public sector to running our unique, practice-based Masters in People and Organisation Development and launching our recent Research Hub on The Future of Organisations.

Who is it for?

This workshop is designed for anyone with a role supporting their team, function or department to engage more skilfully with the complexity of the public sector. Typical participants include:
